Middling Stages of the Path to Enlightenment

ॐद्वीट.क्च.जभ.मुभ.उद्येट.च.चर्षयोश.स्र्रो।

Commentary by the Venerable Geshe Doga Translated by Sandup Tsering

3 October 2018

We can begin the session by making sure that you feel comfortable and relaxed.

As we are here to learn about meditation practice, the two main tools to apply in meditation are mindfulness and alertness.

As discussed previously, it is important not only to apply these two tools of mindfulness and alertness in meditation, but the application of these tools is also important in our everyday lives and actions.

The goal of meditation practice is to train our mind, and through this training, to familiarise and habituate our mind and thoughts towards a more positive way of thinking. Therefore we need to know the difference between a positive state of mind and a negative state of mind.

In order to understand one's mind, we have to turn our focus and mental attention within ourselves. For instance, when we sit quietly and let the mind settle within ourselves and observe the arising of various thoughts and our state of mind, we can check how a certain state of mind, mental attitude or thought causes a feeling of disturbance and agitation when it arises. There may be sudden impulses which cause you to take some actions, and when you look at those actions, they may be destructive or harmful to yourself or others. Likewise, we can also observe that when a different thought or state of mind arises within us, we feel very calm and peaceful and we have positive impulses in terms of motivating ourselves to do something beneficial for ourselves and for others.

As we become more aware of our own mind and our own self, we notice that we have something called 'a mind' and then our 'self', which we refer to as 'I'. We also have a physical body, so there's a body, a mind and then our self. These three things always accompany each other all the time. In this way, if we observe the voice of the 'I', it sometimes says to us, 'I feel good', or on other days, 'I feel bad'. Sometimes we feel happy and sometimes we feel unhappy, which you hear from your own self.

When we say to ourselves, 'I feel unhappy', if we have a closer look at the cause of the feeling of unhappiness, and where it is immediately derived from, we will notice that it arises from within ourselves. Normally in our perception and view, we feel and believe that this cause is external, but in fact it is from within ourselves, which is important to recognise. If it is within ourselves we will notice that this unhappiness is a direct result of our own state of mind which we experience in that particular moment. Therefore, it is good to be aware of this state of mind by looking within and seeing how our experience of this unhappiness is directly related to the type of state of mind within ourselves and realising that it doesn't arise from some external event or thing. For example, if we have the emotion of anger or hatred within ourselves, we will definitely feel agitated and disturbed. We cannot find anyone with a strong presence of anger within their mind who says that they feel very calm and happy, therefore it is good to relate this to one's own state of mind. If we were to check the cause of the arising of this anger, the main condition is due to a lack of control over your own state of mind. In this way, we will notice that the fluctuation of our feelings of pain, happiness or unhappiness depends on the state of mind that accompanies us at that time.

Essentially, what we are talking about here is something that everybody should apply in their lives, which will be very beneficial. It has nothing to do with religious faith but studying one's state of mind and training to transform one's state of mind would be effective in terms of bringing more happiness into one's life and reducing suffering. When we don't do anything about the mental attitudes that we hold within ourselves, such as a short temper and an angry mind, these can make one's life miserable and very unhappy.

In fact, it would be helpful to understand from our own experience, that when anger occupies and dominates our mind, this will have a very negative effect on our personality. Even if one is normally a gentle person, anger can transform one's face so much that it is frightening to others. If we don't do anything to overcome anger and we attempt to create an action under the influence of an angry mind, when we look at the words we speak, which can also be unpleasant, destructive and harmful.

Furthermore, we need to consider whether the impression we give to others and to the world makes any difference to our life. If we think about it, who will be the victims of such destructive actions and our mental attitude? These actions are affecting those who are important in our lives such as our husband or wife, partner or close friends. Just as in Tibetan culture, when people marry, they take a vow that for the rest of their lives, they will share all happiness and suffering together. These are the closest people who get affected and victimised. As a result of this, you cause suffering not only to yourself and to your closest ones, but it will also have an impact on all your relationships.

Therefore, we have to contemplate and understand the importance of recognising the destructiveness of such a negative state of mind on one's life and others' lives. We need to consider how to reduce and then overcome the negative state of mind. One important practice is tolerance and patience, which is more than simply being responsive to the situation. The practice of patience has to come from a clear recognition and understanding of the situation, because if one expresses anger or does something out of anger, then that will destroy the peace and happiness in one's family. If that happens, it will be a great loss and disadvantage to oneself. From this clear understanding, you will appreciate the benefit of meditation, so that you will practise tolerance and patience to ensure your ability to show some resilience and endurance in the face of adverse situations. The practice of patience definitely doesn't mean that you are responsive, while holding the anger within yourself in the form of resentment, which can be very destructive.

We can encourage and motivate ourselves to cultivate a more positive mental attitude, such as being kind, compassionate and extending more love towards those with whom we interact every day. We will be able to recognise the benefit of cultivating and developing a positive mental attitude, which is not only for our own experience of peace and happiness, but also our actions and the impression we give to others – whatever we are saying and doing – will be very pleasing to them. This is how we can strengthen our relationship with others.

We can notice that each negative state of mind, such as anger, produces a different experience and has a different effect. Sometimes strong desire or attachment can also be negative emotions in the sense that they can cause much misery and suffering. The feeling of desire and attachment and its effect can be very different. You will notice that when you experience the emotion of anger, it can be very wild and rough. It will be apparent immediately, so after becoming aware of it, if you acknowledge that it is very harmful and tell yourself that you have to be more careful to ensure that you don't do anything under the influence of this emotion, the anger will suddenly decrease.

When anger arises, the destructive force can be very apparent, but at the same time, it can be easier for us to recognise its shortcomings, and therefore we are able to overcome it more easily. However it is not like that when we experience strong desire and attachment. Desire as an emotion is quite deceptive in that it gives us a rather pleasant feeling, and a notion that fulfilling the desire is a way to bring about happiness. Of course, that's not the case and in fact if desire is not overcome, then in the long run, it can bring more harm to oneself. It is even harder to overcome than anger.

Therefore, we have to try to understand that when we engage in meditation practice, our sole purpose is to counteract the negative states of mind within us, by calming and controlling our mind, because it is said that if we have control over our mind, we are free of the effects of the negative mental afflictions. When we don't have control of our mind and we check who has control, we will notice that our mind is under the control and power of the various mental afflictions such as anger, desire and so forth. We are always overpowered by our mind, and the actions we carry out depend on our state of our mind. It is said that the only way to achieve some sense of freedom and happiness is to gain control over one's mind. The great Sakya Pandita said that achieving self independence is like achieving the state of happiness, whereas not having self independence and being under the control of other force is misery and suffering. Therefore, there is no escape from misery and suffering if our mind is under the control of or overpowered by these mental afflictions.

As part of giving advice to monks for example, the Buddha said that if the monk has a short-tempered nature, then you should offer good food, clothing and a nice shelter. However, if the monk is desirous and lustful, then you should not offer good food, clothing and shelter. What we learn from this is when someone is very angry, if you offer very delicious food or do something to please that person; once that person is mentally pleased or something gives them pleasure, then it will automatically cause the anger to disappear because the food that you offer gives them some mental happiness, which cannot co-exist with the hatred towards you.

There is a difference between someone who understands anger and its shortcomings and also how to counteract it, and someone else who does not understand this. Someone with the understanding can recognise anger when it arises, and also they can apply an antidote to counter it. Whereas a person who doesn't have any knowledge about anger and its detrimental affects, will easily fall prey to anger and won't know how to get out of the clutch of anger.

We can apply different techniques in order to handle various states of mind. For example, in order to challenge the mind of desire, whatever we apply, our approach cannot be gentle. I'd would like to share a story about a younger friend who was very fond of me, who I used to deliberately tease and annoy when he was sleeping peacefully. I would smear his face or do something to wake him up, and my friend would get very upset and angry. This continued, and eventually my friend changed his nature. On the other hand, as mentioned previously, the way to challenge someone with an angry mind is to do something gentle, such as offer food to please someone who is angry with you.

Before we begin our usual breathing meditation, it is important to make ourselves comfortable and to relax physically. If you are familiar with a certain meditation posture, then you can adopt that, such as with two hands in meditative equipoise. It is also important to get rid of all distracting thoughts from the mind, making sure that the mind is calmed down and is fully resting within yourself. In the same way that our body depends on the ground on which to sit, likewise our mind also needs an object on which to rest. The object for this meditation is the breath, so what we will be doing in this meditation is to try to keep the mind on the inhaling and exhaling alone, without letting it wander off to other objects. We will begin the meditation now.

[Pause for single-pointed meditation]

We will continue the meditation with the chanting of the Buddha's mantra. As we chant, we simply direct our focus to the sound of the mantra.

TAYATHA OM MUNI MUNI MAHA MUNAYE SOHA

That's all for tonight; thank you for coming to this talk.

Transcribed by Ai Chin Khor Edit 1 by Ingrid Leibbrandt Edit 2 by Sandup Tsering Edited Version

© Tara Institute

3 October 2018